Customer Reviews

Letters To Harry is a beautifully committed story of a woman's struggle to be true and good in the face of her mother's suffering and death from breast cancer. Janet Farrington Graham gives voice to our deepest fears and our greatest strengths. Her prose sings.

There is an audience for a book like this. It just was not me. I am 25 years old and lost my mother to breast cancer two years ago. This book reaffirms my belief that everyone has a different story to tell about cancer and how it has touched their life. I was looking for some common ground and found little with the author. For me, the book was simply a series of metaphors comparing nature with life. Beyond that, the reader has to sift through the mind of the author, seemingly reading her thoughts as she writes them. I appreciate how personal this must have been for the author to do, but it was quite abstract.

My mom has lung cancer, so I could relate to this book very well. Anyone who knows someone with cancer should read this. What a well written, detailed, compassionate book. Up until this book I was unable to locate anything like it. As far as I am concerned, it rates a ten! The reading is smooth, honest and really deals with the emotions that arise when dealing with cancer, for all those involved. I have passed it onto my moms oncologist counselor in order to help others in similar situations.

A should read for those with aging parents -- and more so for the parents
