Nice book of recipes. A quick reference does make me think of a reference of oils and what they do - that information is not in this book. Beginners who want this information will need to look elsewhere. However, it has a lot of good information on how to actually USE your oils that you already have. Got a cold, mix these together and do this or that (dilute with carrier and apply topically, add these to a diffuser, add some to a bowl of warm water and inhale the steam, etc.). In some areas the author could be more clear in exactly what to do ... so if you have absolutely no experience there are better books out there that explain how to do things (things like making master blends to then use to do different things, like put in lotions, or diffuse, or dilute with carrier, or make a room spray out of, or make a compress, etc.). Another thing to be aware of - the author uses Young Living oils and mentions blends that you might not know what are unless you use Young Living oils. There are conversion charts on the internet that identify other brand blends that are equivalent or similar that can assist you so you can find out what the name of your brand's blend it that is similar. The last thing to be aware of - the author uses a lot of really expensive oils (not related to brand, but the oil itself). Not many people who are beginners or even experienced will have all of Rose, Jasmine, Melissa, Neroli, and Sandalwood. Experienced people with oils will have a few of these, some will have all. The author throws them into recipes like they cost $10 each. It would be much more useful for people to give substitutions in the recipe - for example you can substitute Cedarwood for Sandalwood or Benzoin and Cedarwood in equal parts in most recipes.
