Customer Reviews

As I come from a super religious family, I totally understand how much damage they can do to someone who doesn't fit into their narrow box of expectations. So after repeatedly reading about how rigid and unbendingly fanatical soon to be college graduate Adam's parents were in their expectations of him and their overzealousness in their own practice, I was expecting to see that Adam would have to experience a complete break from them after being given an ultimatum from them to be like they were or be cut from their lives forever. Because, let's face it, that kind of life long dedication to one specific set of beliefs does not go away because the person's church "adopts a tolerance policy". It would have made more sense to me if the parents had walked away from that church and found another who practiced the super fundamentalist viewpoint that his parents had through the entire book, all while taking the "high road" and demanding that Adam bow to their rules or be dead in their eyes. Other than that, I felt that Adam was somewhat of a split personality in that he had the need for the gritty, sexualized side of his nature to make an appearance at times, with the cam sessions, while his sweet vulnerability had him seeking someone to love and accept him at the same time. I thought that Blake's actions made sense in a realistic world, as people do not want to disappoint someone they are falling in love with, for fear of rejection and loss of that new found love. He seemed to be written as a bit more naive than I would have expected given his job and the fact that he had lived in the real world for a while. But real people have real fears that make them feel small to themselves at times.
